

LOU HALL LOCKED IN THE SAME CELL WITH BEN RUBIN

Lou Hall and Ben Rubin are now locked in the same cell.

The sturdy woodcutter, who for more than sixty days has been held at Fairfax for the murder of Eva Roy, is now bed fellow with the escaped convict, who for more than six days maintained he had slain the girl, and then repudiated his "confession."

Good Cell Mates.

The reason for the doubling up of prisoners is that Edith Haas, an Indian, confessed horse thief, is now occupying the cell which so long has been the prison of Ben Rubin. Hall, the Fairfax county jailer, says that one isolated cell which would be used for a woman prisoner. Hall and Rubin are making the best of cell mates, and when asked about their connection with the crime which led to their imprisonment, each grin at each other. Since Hall's association with Rubin he seems to have grown more cheerful and according to the authorities, is taking more care of his personal appearance.

Talk About Russia.

Rubin is a native of Russia, and spends much time relating to Hall his early experiences of that country, while Hall entertains the man who tried to shoulder the crime with which he is charged with stories of the forest and hills in rural Virginia. Hall says he likes his new quarters because in the cell with Rubin it is not so lonely nor is his view of the world so shut in. In his present location he can look out on the court house square, with the Fairfax citizens moving about in the daily routine of business life. Both men smoke and chew tobacco, but Hall goes his fellow prisoner one better in the line of "enjoyable habits"—using snuff. In this habit Hall has the edge on all other prisoners in the jail, according to a poll taken yesterday afternoon.

Rubin Likes Jail.

Rubin says that he would much rather be confined in the Fairfax county jail, even associated with Lou Hall, than in any place he has ever had to stay. He declares he has not only spent part of a term at the Lorton reformatory and in the District barracks, but also much time in the military guard houses of the country before his discharge from the regular army.

Both men will in all probability be locked in the same cell until their trials in November on their indictments for the murder of Eva Roy.
